Keeping your career on track

Here are some of the bigger mistakes professionals make on the road to success, and how best to avoid them

Choosing a career is hard enough, but what if you've made some wrong turns along the way?

"It's never too late to reassess your professional life and straighten out your course," said John M. McKee, author of "21 Ways Women in Management Shoot Themselves in the Foot."

"You need to be asking yourself, 'What do I want to be doing 10 years from now?' So many people just look at an immediate fix rather than the big picture."

So how can you avoid taking any missteps while forging your path to success?

"The biggest mistake I see professionals make is when they try to move forward without a firm plan in place," said Helen Latimer, a business consultant and co-author with McKee of the book "The Plan: Personal Balance, Career Success, Financial Strength."

"Women in particular will often let others manage their career. If you organize your own goals, it means you have to be honest about your wants and hopes for your future, and sometimes that can be difficult."

Even if you're satisfied with your goals, experts say many people have a problem taking credit for a job well done.

"We don't celebrate ourselves," said Judith Wright, a best-selling author and educator. "We think it's boasting or ego if we give ourselves credit for our accomplishments, but it's so important to let people know what you're doing."

"Men are often quick to give themselves a pat on the back, but not women," said McKee. "They will give credit to the team, but rarely will they stand up and say, 'Yes, it was me!'"

And don't be afraid to check in with your boss. "One big no-no is assuming your boss is aware of your every move," said McKee. "They need to be reminded of what you're working on, and you should never shy away from keeping them up to speed on your accomplishments."

"Plan a monthly lunch or a steady time to meet with your superior," said Wright. "It's not bugging. It's doing them a favor by communicating what you're up to. When people feel like they are part of what you're achieving, they are more proud of your success."

Here are more tips from our experts to ensure you're on track for optimal success:

■ Ask for help. "Often we think that this is a sign of weakness," Latimer said. "We need to set up a support system. Whether it's getting groceries or asking someone to take some of your workload, reach out and know there are people willing to be there for you."

■ Remember that it's never too late to get started. "I often encounter people out of work who are in their 50s and 60s," said McKee. "Even in our later decades we can take a longer look and reinvent ourselves."

■ Don't react out of fear. "Often I see people take just any job rather than taking something that is the right fit," Latimer said. "This means you might be in a position where you are lacking certain skills or have weaknesses. It also might be a short-termed situation. If you take the dead-end job, it can be more stressful than staying unemployed."

■ Don't play it safe. "When you're playing it safe, you're playing it small," Wright said. "The ones who are willing to take a risk ... those people don't plateau. Our brain is about transformation. It's designed to learn and grow, and we aren't using it correctly."
