An Eco Bag that Helps Impoverished Women in Laos

The Nature Bag can not only help tote your groceries home from the store but also help reduce poverty in Laos. The bag has been handmade for centuries in Laos by the Khmu tribe, some of the most impoverished people in the world. Laos has one of the lowest per capita income levels in the world.

The Nature Bags are now being produced by the Khmu as part of a poverty reduction headed by young Lao student Bonsou Keoamphone, the son of a poor rice farmer in the remote, mountainous Oudomxai Province in Northern Laos.

Nature Bags are stretchable and expandable, lightweight but extremely strong. But this is not your mother's generic mesh-like bag. Most Nature Bags have an appearance that is somewhat shiny, like silk or satin, and have colors that range from a very light tan to medium-dark brown.

The walls of the Nature Bags have considerable stretch and form around the items inside. Fragile items such as fruits and vegetables are much less likely to be bruised, and the unique mesh design of the bag permits airflow throughout. Because each Nature Bag is handmade, no two bags are identical.

The bags are made from wild-growing, organic tropical Kudzu or now called JungleVine, a naturally growing, hearty perennial vine with a deep spreading root that grows quickly during the rainy season and can be found in various parts and higher elevations in Southeast Asia.

JungleVine cord is lightweight but nearly impossible to break, is biodegradable and virtually mold resistant. The Nature Bags range in size from 10 x 6 inches to 24 x 12 inches and range in price from $10-$76 and are available online at: www.NatureBag.org.
